Program Features

The Gerontology Emphasis is a multi-disciplinary program designed to assist students planning to enter career-related areas directly involving older persons, and is open to undergraduate students in any major within the university. The study of gerontology will also help students prepare for their own aging as well as to develop a better understanding of and to seek enrichment for the lives of aging parents and our aging populations. While completing their major, the student will take courses from a wide variety of disciplines (e.g., economics, exercise and sport science, health education and promotion, philosophy, political science, psychology, therapeutic recreation, and sociology). The Gerontology Emphasis consists of 15 credits. At least 6 credits must be taken from the core and the 9 remaining credits can be selected from the core, supportive courses, or other gerontology-related coursework (e.g., internships) approved by the program coordinators.

Occupational Outlook

As the nation’s “Baby Boomers” age, the 65-plus will grow from the present 13 percent to 20 percent of the nation’s population by 2030. This will mean a great demand for individuals with training and experience in working with older adults and aging issues in almost every field from advertising, health and fitness, health economics, human services, law, management, and public policy.

Students may leave campus with a degree in a major such as therapeutic recreation plus the gerontology emphasis and immediately obtain employment working directly with older adults. Others use their degrees to work in research, planning, management of services, or may have more indirect contact with older adults through policy development. Some pursue advanced degrees with a gerontological focus including, but not limited to, a Ph.D., MBA, law degree, OT, or PT.

Students also use gerontology to prepare for their own aging as well as help them to understand and enrich the lives of aging parents and others in their society.

Program Coordinators

Dr. Ellen Rozek
Department of Psychology
erozek@uwlaus.edu
608.785.6899

Dr. Erica Srinivasan
Department of Psychology
esrinivasan@uwlaus.edu
608.785.6882

www.uwlax.edu/gerontology